This invention relates to a process for determining the extent of hydrolysis of a proteinaceous material in aqueous solution in a continuous laboratory test and a self-measuring test-stick. Proteins are composed largely of amino acids, particularly the 20 proteinogenic amino acids, and are hydrolyzed by proteolytic enzymes or digestive systems. For many years, efforts have been made to provide a method for detecting enzymatically hydrolyzed proteins in fresh foods and feeds, especially animal feeds, by measuring the amido nitrogen which is created from proteins as a result of enzymatic hydrolysis. Amido nitrogen is also formed from free amino acids as a result of spontaneous racemization of the amino group, as, for example, occurs in the hydrolysis of proteins, by some proteases, such as trypsin and chymotrypsin. Although various techniques, such as quantitative gas chromatography, potentiometric titration, distillation, coulometry and elemental analysis have been used for detection of amido nitrogen, no method has been heretofore available for either detecting enzymatic hydrolysis of proteins or for detecting spontaneous racemization of amino acids. Proteins are readily hydrolyzed in aqueous solution at an alkaline pH 09e8f5149f

This is an Enterprise license Turn off display License Information This product includes 3 detailed license types, each of which is with its own license key Electronic devices, such as a mobile phone, may perform an authentication to a network according to a client/server model for client devices and servers. More particularly, servers in a communication network (or simply, servers) may store information (such as a public key) and allow client devices to access the stored information for verifying identity of the client devices. A server may provide the identity of the client device to a network (e.g., to authenticate the client device). The network may then validate the identity of the client device. In certain implementations, each time a client device requests access to a server (e.g., upon power-on, booting, connecting to a network), the client device may send a "Pairwise Master Key Negotiation" (PMKNego) request to the server. The PMKNego request may specify a private key of the client device and a public key of the server. Upon receiving the PMKNego request from the client device, the server may provide a PMK to the client device, and may also determine a certificate revocation list (CRL) that may have been updated for the corresponding private key. Upon receiving a response from the server, the client device may then store the PMK and the CRL to authenticate itself.
